SUMO is a ubiquitin-like protein that is conjugated to proteins via a ubiquitin-like cascade, involving an E1-like activating enzyme, an E2-conjugating enzyme, and an E3 ligase. SUMO conjugation has recently been shown to be involved in several plant processes, but not in artichoke (Cynara scolymus L.) cold stress response. In the present study, we focused on the effect of ambient temperature on the endogenous SUMOylation pathway in artichoke. Cold stress at 4 degrees C induced a general decrease in the expression of the genes involved in artichoke SUMOylation at 4 degrees C as compared to the control at 25 degrees C. Accumulation of the SUMO-1 protein was also lower in artichoke leaves and stems exposed to cold stress at 4 degrees C. High levels of the SUMO-1 protein were detected in the green leaves and roots under cold stress at 25 degrees C. When artichoke plants were kept at 4 degrees C for 24 h, an induction of the endogenous SUMOylation pathway was observed in artichoke leaves, stems, and roots, as evidenced by increased levels of the SUMO-1 protein and higher transcript accumulation of the genes involved in artichoke SUMOylation. Moreover, increased accumulation of the SUMO-1 protein was observed in the green leaves, stems, and roots under cold stress at 25 degrees C. These results suggest that the endogenous SUMOylation pathway is activated in artichoke, leading to increased levels of the SUMO-1 protein.
